If you market by direct mail, you'd probably love to: (1) identify who reads your material, and (2) drop the prospects who never even open your brochure. Doug Hotchkiss, sales and marketing director of Overseas Adventure Travel Inc. (OAT), in Cambridge, Mass., thinks he has a way to do both.Last year OAT included a high-stakes contest in its mailing. In order to know about a trip to an exotic locale that the company was giving away -- you could choose, say, Nepal or Peru -- you had to at least open the six-page brochure. And in order to enter the contest, you had to answer six questions drawn from the brochure's text: for example, "Which nonfamily trip is the least difficult of our treks in Nepal?" The trip cost the company as little as $1,800, Hotchkiss says, an insignificant expense compared with the $112,000 in printing and postage OAT saved by cleaning its mailing list of deadweight. Even better, those who entered the contest also had to answer questions about where they wanted to go and when: perfect fodder for OAT's salespeople. Apple's Mail app tracks its history back to the NeXT days. As one of OS X's cornerstone apps, Mail is an absolute essential for most new Mac users who want to send and receive email messages. The software supports IMAP, SMTP and POP email protocols, and works with just about any major email service including Yahoo! Mail, AOL Mail, Google's Gmail and more. In Mavericks, Apple improved scrolling smoothness, and also improved email rendering speed. Messages download faster and it's now possible to view maps inline, thanks to integration with another Mavericks feature, the Maps app. It wasn't all a walk in the park, however — many Gmail users had loads of problems with Mavericks Mail, though Apple ironed out most of them by the time OS X 10.9.4 was released.
